Excerpt: . . . appointed time, as some families are very strict on this point, and will not allow the meals to be kept waiting for anyone who is not present; but if any one is absent or engaged on particular business, a sufficiency of food is then cut off and put aside, so that it may be had in comfort on his return. In well-regulated families, the servants-hall or kitchen-table, when the servants are all present, is distinguished by its decorum, good order, and even good manners, which the upper servants learn from the family and impart to those assembled at meal times. Loose or profane discourse and vulgar habits should be at all times checked by the head servants and avoided by the more humble. In no place does the follies, vices, or virtues of the upper classes operate with more effect than in that of the...
