Not illustrated. 1833 Excerpt: . . . in the degree of moral and religious instruction. At some few gaols no chaplain has yet been appointed, and no religious duties are performed: in several others the attendance of the clergyman is limited to Sundays, and in many cases the duties of reading daily prayers are left to be performed by the keeper. Bibles, testaments, prayer-books, and c. are not generally provided. At a few prisons schools are established; but at several no instruction is given to juvenile offenders in either reading or writing. The treatment of the sick differs materially. At many gaols, a surgeon attends only when sent for; at some he visits twice a week, and at others daily. Several prisons are still without any infirmary, or suitable rooms for the separation of the sick. Further measures are therefore indispensable to insure obedience to the law. If even the Returns required by...
