In the teaching of physics it is assumed generally that one must become familiar with a great number of facts before he can be permitted to generalize at all. Professor Mach says substantially that it is not needful to know very much--that is, many details of a subject--in order to understand fundamental principles. If this idea were general, it would make much difference in the amount and kind of instruction given in schools of all grades. Finally, the lecturer takes a hand in the old controversy about the curriculum, and speaks as one familiar with the data on both sides of the question as to the relative value of classical and scientific educations. Altogether the book is a good one,...
